Theses and Dissertations in the B.R.A. Library

We have decided to publish this list of theses and dissertations for several reasons. Firstly, we have received so many requests from members for this information that we realized that there must be many people who would find such a list useful. Secondly, it is difficult to locate theses that are not published in extenso in a periodical, or even to know of their existence. Requirements and custom vary: in some countries, publication of a thesis (normally as a separate unit) is a condition of acceptance by the examining body; in other countries, publication of more than a summary of the most important findings is exceptional, and only three or four copies of the actual thesis exist. Some of the material in these theses may not be of a standard suitable for publication, but this is not universally true. Some theses deal with such specialized subjects that no journal will accept them; others have so many illustrations that they are too expensive to reproduce.

Much information is stored away in such theses and dissertations which could be valuable to a research worker studying similar problems, if he could be made aware of their existence and given access to them. The third reason for publishing the present list is, therefore, the hope that we shall encourage other scientists to deposit copies of their theses in the B.R.A. Library. Any spare copies of theses that other libraries can send us will, of course, be most welcome. Recent theses will be reported in Apicultural Abstracts, and all will be included in supplementary lists to the present one in Bee World.

We should be most grateful if any readers can contribute to a more complete list of existing theses on bees, honey, etc., by searching their own university catalogues or the lists compiled by such journals as Dissertation Abstracts. Photocopying becomes easier and cheaper year by year, and our final aim is to have a complete collection of postgraduate theses (or their summaries) relating to subjects within our field of reference.

The U.D.C. number for theses and dissertations, (043), will be used for all abstracts of theses we receive in the future.
